Special Issue
Psychological consequences and risk factors for first responders, and possible legal ramifications for these organisations

This special issue aims to contribute to the understanding of the interface between the different risk and protective factors associated with psychological consequences for first responders, and the legal consequences and implications for first responder organisations in relation to these psychological consequences. We are particularly interested in manuscripts that include, but are not limited to, the following types. However, the author(s) will need to address the intersection of psychological consequences of workers who are first responders, the risk factors associated with these consequences, and the wider legal ramifications for first responder organisations.

1. Theoretical papers which explore and critique the link between the psychological consequences for first responders and the legal consequences for their organisations.
2. Studies that systematically review the literature on the intersection of first responder mental health and the law.
3. Empirical studies that explore the link between mental health outcomes and legal consequences for first responders.
4. Empirical studies that test models of prevention, such as organisational intervention, of poor mental health outcomes in first responders, especially from a legal perspective.

We recognise the variety of first responder types and first responder organisations around the world, and the diversity of social, cultural, and political factors that may influence first responder mental health and its legal dimensions. With this in mind, we welcome submissions from researchers worldwide. We also welcome contributions, not just from psychology, but from allied disciplines such as criminology, sociology, and the medical sciences.

Please note that submission of abstracts does not mean acceptance, and invited manuscripts will undergo peer review.
