

Paul R. Martin

Paul R. Martin is an Adjunct Professor at Monash University and Griffith University. Academic positions that he has held include Director of the Research School of Psychology at The Australian National University, Head of the School of Applied Psychology at Griffith University, and Professor/Director of Psychology for Monash University and Southern Health. He is a clinical and health psychologist who completed his training at the Universities of Bristol and Oxford. He is a Fellow of the British Psychological Society, an Honorary Fellow of the Australian Psychological Society (APS), and a Fellow of the International Association of Applied Psychology. He has held a number of professional leadership positions including National President of the Australian Behaviour Modification Association, Director of Science and then President of the APS, and President of the 27th International Congress of Applied Psychology. His main research interest has been headache and migraine, with subsidiary interests in depression, anxiety, stress, and social support. He has authored/edited eight books and 160 journal articles and chapters. His research program has received extensive funding including 12 Project Grants from NHMRC, and grants from beyondblue and the Austrian Science Fund. In 2003 he received a Centenary Medal “For service to Australian society and medicine”, and in 2015 he received a Medal of the Order of Australia “For service to medicine in the field of psychology”.